Nutritional status of lower limb amputees. The prevalence of malnutrition among lower limb amputees has been very variable in the literature. The aim of this study was to assess the nutritional status in a homogeneous group of lower limb amputees and to identify the influence of amputation level and age on nutrient intake. Lower limb amputees were consecutively recruited. In all cases, nutrient intakes were estimated by a 3-day dietary recall and a 7-day food record. Nutrient analysis was performed using the appropriate United States Department of Agriculture Nutrient Analysis System software. Inclusion criteria were patients on long-term prosthetic treatment and age  $\geq$  18 years. The study included 22 subjects (71% males). The mean age of the whole population was 61.5 years; 63.6% of subjects had an amputation level above knee and 36.4% had been amputated for more than 1 year. The average energy intake was 15.6% of energy needs, and the average percentage of energy from protein was 15.7%, from fat was 43.3% and from carbohydrate was 25.8%. After adjusting the variables for energy intake, age and duration of amputation, subjects with amputation level above knee had higher energy and protein intakes than subjects with amputation level below knee (P 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to flow control devices and, more particularly, to an integrated safety-in-use (Siu) system and method for a fully-portable wastewater treatment plant. 2. Description of Related Art The need for clean water often forces the unwilling general public to install a wastewater treatment plant in their homes and businesses. There are many challenges to overcome in the installation of wastewater treatment plants, however, one of the greatest concerns is the potential for leakage during and after installation. Leakage of wastewater through hoses and small gaps in container enclosures for sewage treatment plants generally requires expensive repair or replacement. If not properly
